

Super Trans-woman

In 1990, a version of The Flash, John Wesley Shipp starred as the speedster. This was a brief flashy, yet low tech television series. It was also very violent. Dial telephones terribly date the show. Iris West was sent to Paris, which reduced love interests to zero. Star Labs looked like a deli from the outside. The scientist Christina McGuire was another flat platonic character.

In a parallel fantasy, I as Romana could be working in my laboratory, where there were shelves filled with creams and cosmetic that could spill on me as lightning struck me and turned me into Super Trans-woman. Christina would help me utilize my powers and help me develop the gender gun. The characteristic of this weapon would be classified. Once again, this would all be very platonic.

However, there is a newer, much better-developed version of The Flash. Iris West, a fantastic black woman, has become a superb character. As with much of the DCEU, characters were no longer flat, but even got involved with each other as love interests. John Wesley Shipp even got a new role as a flash from a parallel world.

Super Trans-woman in this newer scheme could be much more interesting. It would be okay to get involved with Christina.
